Season 1 recap:

In Season 1 we focused on Haven Otomo, who spends her spare time saving people from jumping off the Golden Gate Bridge. Possessed with unnatural powers of persuasion, she's always been good at talking people in and out of things. When a rash of suicides hits the city, a detective reaches out for her help on the investigation, and her insight into why people kill themselves. When the crime becomes more complicated. She must question the people she trusts most, and whether they are involved.

In Season 2, the villain goes by Walking Sam, which is based on a real and modern myth of a Slenderman-like character in South Dakota, in Oglala Sioux country, who whispers to people until they kill themselves. The podcast also explores an internet myth known as a "Blue Whale," an internet legend where people hurt themselves over a period of 50 days, until they are pushed to kill themselves.

Creator Alex Dolan explains his intentions for the series: "Suicide, depression, and mental health are highly stigmatized topics. Veiled as a thriller, fans can explore these issues in a safe space. The fact that we aren't discussing it more baffles me. And now, post-COVID, many people are acutely aware of depression. Many of us are living with it. It's a moral imperative to let people know they aren't alone and enable anyone needing treatment to get help."

The World Health Organization and the Global Burden of Disease study estimate that almost 80,000 people die from suicide every year, about one person every forty seconds.
